Melvin Edwards | Public Sector

Alexander Gray Associates presents Melvin Edwards "Ukpo. Edo" (1993/1996), as part of Art Basel Miami Beach's Public Sector, curated by Nicholas Baume. The principal motive in the three part sculpture, is the incorporation of welded steel chains, an object that the artist has explored over the past five decades. His interest in chains stems primarily from aesthetic concerns that interconnect its historical and symbolic meanings—for the artist, the links of chains carry a twofold connotation pointing to the history of slavery and oppression, while also symbolizing the interrelation between people and cultures. Edwards' work reflects his engagement with the history of race, labor, violence, as well as with themes of African Diaspora.

Regina Silveira | Film Sector

The Gallery presents Regina Silveira's video "Morfás" (1981), as part of the Film Sector at Art Basel Miami Beach 2015. "Morfás" showcases common objects such as an umbrella, a comb, kitchen utensils, and a long-barreled rifle, a theme that she continued through later work, including her emblematic photograms "Enigmas" (1981). Renowned for her parodic explorations of space through geometric constructs, Silveira has investigated the representation of reality, and the meaning of visual imagery. Her artistic vocabulary includes various methods of perspectival projection, including skiagraphia (the study of shadows).

Hassan Sharif

Alexander Gray Associates presents recent and historical work by Hassan Sharif (b.1951), focusing on weaving as method and metaphor. Recognized as a pioneer of conceptual art and experimental practice in the United Arab Emirates, over the past four decades Sharif has transgressed traditional frameworks for art making by extending his practice to performance, installation, drawing, painting, and assemblage that integrates ordinary objects as the primary medium.

After familiarizing himself with the ideas of Dada and Fluxus art during his studies in the early 1980s at Byam Shaw School of Art in London, Sharif created performance-based works engaging repetition, landscape and the body, motifs that would continue throughout his practice. Sharif began weaving common objects he encountered in his native Sharjah and Dubai—such as ropes, cloth, newspapers, cardboard, rugs, plates, and spoons—to create artworks. By cutting, bending, grouping, and braiding these cultural artifacts, the artist sheds their functionality to enhance their aesthetic and political significance. As art historian Paulina Kolczynska explained, “Like a cultural anthropologist, Sharif created an interesting synthesis of the visual landscape, as seen through the prism of an influx of objects amid a quickly changing lifestyle.”

Rooted in conceptual performance, Sharif’s rhythmic act of weaving echoes the unconscious functions of the human body, such as eating, breathing, and walking, by associating them with domestic objects. For his recent large-scale wall-sculpture Ladies and Gentlemen (2014), Sharif assembled mass-produced and inexpensive female and male shoes, into a tapestry object that emphasizes seriality and the dislocation of functional objects. Through this act he transforms and synthesizes these seemingly impersonal articles in order to question authorship, labor, commercialism, social doctrine, gender and migration.

Also presented are Sharif’s “Objects,” such as Plugs No. 1 (2014), a group of assorted plugs bagged in mesh packets, which speak to the increasing modernization and industrialization occurring in U.A.E. Sharif began conceptualizing his “Objects” in the 1980s, buying ordinary articles in local markets that are manipulated into sculptures infused with humor and randomness, rendering the defining characteristics of mass-produced utilitarian materials as political and socioeconomic commentaries on present-day society. As the artist expressed, “I inject my works with a realism that exposes this socio-political economic monster, allowing people a chance to recognize the danger of over indulgence in this form of negative consumption.”
