The Whitney Biennial, one of America's most watched and controversial exhibitions, has unveiled the lineup for its next edition, which opens in April. The list of 63 artists and collectives chosen by curators David Breslin and Adrienne Edwards spans three generations and suggests that the exhibition's first pandemic-era iteration will have a decidedly conceptual and interdisciplinary bent.

Besides the participants, the curators also revealed the title of the show: "Quiet as It's Kept". The colloquial term – invoked in the work of novelist Toni Morrison, jazz drummer Max Roach and artist David Hammons – usually precedes a traditionally unspoken statement. The show, which was originally scheduled to open in 2021, has been pushed back a year. It will now run from April 6 to September 5, 2022.

The show will continue its tradition of questioning what it means to be an "American artist," with a particular focus on creators from Mexico, particularly Ciudad Juárez and Tijuana, First Nations artists in Canada, and artists born in outside of North America.

If the Whitney Biennial has sometimes served to discover a host of new talents, this edition is resolutely intergenerational. The oldest artist is the Puerto Rican choreographer Awilda Sterling-Duprey, born in 1946; the youngest is Mexican artist Andrew Roberts, born in 1995, whose work draws inspiration from technology used in warfare and the entertainment industry.

This year's biennale will also integrate performance and film into the galleries, placing them on an equal footing with the rest of the work rather than siloing them into separate programs. The curators promise that the exhibition will evolve throughout its journey and that its two main floors are designed to act as counterpoints: one, a dark and contained maze; the other, open and bright.

"We began planning for this exhibit, originally scheduled for 2021, nearly a year before the 2020 election, before the pandemic and shutdown with their shaken effects, before the uprisings demanding racial justice, and before the questioning institutions and their structures," the Conservatives said in a statement. "Although many of these underlying conditions are not new, their overlap, intensity and pervasiveness have created a context in which the past, present and future have become embedded. We have curated the exhibition to reflect these precarious and improvised times.
